

PS
3537
©58©5
1916

CHILDREN OF THE SUN

---

SCHOLL

Class PS 25 37

Book C 58 C 5

Copyright N<sup>o</sup> 1916

COPYRIGHT DEPOSIT

CHILDREN OF THE SUN POEMS

BY

JOHN WILLIAM SCHOLL

//

2
2
3
3
3
3

MCCCCXVI
ARTS AND LETTERS
917 FOREST AVE., ANN ARBOR, MICH.

PS 3537
C 58 C 5
1916

COPYRIGHT, 1916, BY J. W. SCHOLL

OTHER WORKS

THE LIGHT-BEARER OF LIBERTY

SOCIAL TRAGEDIES

AN ODE TO THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

HESPER-PHOSPHOR

THE ANN ARBOR PRESS
PRINTERS

$1.25
DEC 22 1916

© Cl. A 453212
201.

Of This Book Two Hundred and Fifty Copies have been printed. The first One Hundred, with Frontispiece Portrait, are numbered and autographed by the author. This Volume is No.....

University of Michigan, 1916.

CONTENTS

---

A HYMN TO THE SUN . . . . .	7
NAPOLEON AT AIX . . . . .	37
LOVE'S TRIUMPH . . . . .	45
THE RINGEL DANCE . . . . .	49
THE LONG ROAD . . . . .	52
THE IDEAL . . . . .	55
THE SMITH'S SONG . . . . .	57
LOST LOVE'S RETURN . . . . .	59
IN THE DESERT . . . . .	61
THE DRAGON-FLY . . . . .	62
INVITATION . . . . .	63
WHITE WASTE OF SNOW . . . . .	64
THE PERFECT ROSE . . . . .	65
MY CAT-BIRD . . . . .	66
ON MOUNTAIN HEIGHTS . . . . .	67
ONE SOLE STAR FIXED . . . . .	68
WHEN LUCIA CAME . . . . .	69
LEAVES ARE WE . . . . .	70
FRA ELBERTUS . . . . .	71
MY SHRINE . . . . .	72
ZEPHYR AND MYRTLE . . . . .	73
A MEMORY . . . . .	74

*When Dawn is afire the Day-god waits
On the rim of the east for the opening gates
    To give his champing steeds the reins
    And chase up the steep cerulean plains,
Spilling his chariot's golden freights.*

*To hold his image each dew-drop strains
And dies of the glory its heart contains,
    Burst with a splendor that devastates
        When Dawn is afire.*

*Bird-throats are shaken in woodsey lanes,
Rose-buds are swelling with keen birth pains,
    Stirred at his nod to blood red fates.
    I too must sing till his spell abates,
For his golden wine is in my veins
        When Dawn is afire.*

A HYMN TO THE SUN.

O great Lord Sun,
That bringest in this hour
From out thy dun
Nocturnal bower
The sibyl gift,
A fresh new day
With winged chance freighted
For souls to take or cast away,
And sternly fated
To be withdrawn as swift
As it is given,
Lord of the riven
Eastern sky,
With unaverted eye
Let me adore
Thee evermore!

O glorious God,
Far-darting All-Seer,
Smite with thy rod,
With thy golden spear,
Land and sea,
Forest and lea,
And wake young Pan
From night's drowsy ban
To love and its making—
A glorious awaking!
Smite the darkling stream,
Whose clear pools steam,
Till they glint and gleam
And the shadow slips
And slinks away
Before the full-orbed day!
Smite bosky glen
And checkered grove,
And prick again
The nested choirs
To new desires
And shake their throats
With happy notes
Of jubilant love!
And smite my lips
To outsing the birds,
That fair fit words
In wedded throngs
Rush into songs
In life's high honor,
To life's great Donor,
To thee, the Immortal,
At thy golden portal
In the cloudy rocks,
To thee and the nod
Of thy roseate locks,
O glorious God!

Thou great All-Giver,
All-Holder and Sustainer,
Prayer and gift disdainer,
Who givest and withholdest,
And with equal eye beholdest
All glories pass—
Blade of grass
And cassocked priest,
Greatest and least—
O radiant Archer,
From out thy quiver
Thou takest the bolts of living light
And hurlest them into the night
And infinite void,
Where worlds o'erjoyed
Lay bare their hearts
To catch the impregning darts
In a golden shower
Of mystic power
To stir them to mirth
And riotous laughter
Of a wondrous birth
To be hereafter,
To glad thee, Prodigal God,
With multitudinous avatars,
Thee, Bounteous Marcher
On ways untrod
Among the stars.

Bathed in thy flood
The lush fields lie.
Purple as blood
Is the glory-barred sky.
And the swell of jubilant life,
And the roar of mighty strife,
Sweeps like a tide
Onrushing, wide,
Resistless, round
Earth's dawnlit bound,
As thou peerest over
Her dewy brim
And chasest featly
Night's fugitive rim
That dodges fleetly
In frightened grace
And runs to cover
Behind the girdling hills,
Afraid of thy face
And thy dispersing rod,
O radiant God.

Thy bounty hurled
Upon our world
So fills and spills
The cup of our feast
From thy ambrosial East
At thy immortal nod,
O Prodigal God,
We quite forget—
Our lips with thy abundance wet—
With thy wine and bread
A myriad hungering
Worlds might be fed,
And thou art no mongering
Niggard Lord
That spares his hoard,
But hurlest from thy treasure
Without measure
Gifts that beggar
The wildest fancy of seer or poet,
Hoards that stagger
The soul that would show it,
But thou art o'erjoyed,
Abounder, to bestow it,
Hurlest it broadcast into the void
Of thy ambient sphere
Incessant,
Afar, anear,
Ever crescent,
Without return,
To quicken or burn
Where they chance to fall
Prodigal,
Abounding alike to all.
Forgive if thy pensioners
Ephemeral

Sometimes forget,
The feast that's set
Is but one crumb of thy royal feast
Dropped down at the gates of thy purple East
For the waiting lazar, Earth,
That our riotous mirth
Is but one note in the vast concourse
Of hallelujahs flung
To thee, the Ever Young,
The Birth-Bringer
And Mirth-Bringer,
Ambrosial Singer,
Choragus of the morning-stars
Whose song no discord mars.

O is it blindness
From too long gazing
On thy blazing Orient state?
Or overweening pride,
Thou glory-eyed
Far-darting All-Seer,
When mortals raise
Sweet hymns to praise
Thy partial kindness
And thee, that goest
Thy lofty way
And scarcely knowest
That they live?
Dost even hear
Faintly our exultant cry
In thy purple-flooded sky?
And yet forgive
Our erring clay,
If, wrapped in thy perfect day,
Our little seems so great,
Our penury so Croesus-like,
We cannot fear
Thy hand will strike
Our lips with hunger
Or our flesh with cold—
If our lips grow bold
With the riddles of Fate,
And we call thee younger Brother of man,
Sumpter and slave
In eternal ban,
That bringeth seed-time and harvest unending
To glad us wending
From the womb to the grave!

Thou stirrest the daughters of Ocean to blow
Their breath to the sky
And build the clouds that go
Like galleons drifting by
With bellying sails,
Freighted with Neptunean gifts.
Thou smitest the hills
Till they quiver and burn,
And out of their rifts,
From hidden caverns and nestling dales,
The wind-wraiths yearn
And rush and leap
To the lazy floating argosies
Of the skyey deep,
And clutch and hurl them wide
With scudding keels
And wrecked and helpless pilot wheels
In the mad tumultuous dance
Of the Stormwind's bride,
Till the far-off mountain peaks
Gore hulk and sail
And the far-fetched cargo spills
In torrents of rain
Through the driving gale,
And the brown-parched plain
With the spoil of plundered seas
Sweetly reeks
And is green again.
Thou whilest
And smilest,
Bright God of Day,
On thy lofty way
Among the stars,
And deep in the earth
Glad things conceive

And swell and heave
And yearn to burst their icy bars,
And leap to birth
And thy welcoming kiss
Of ethereal fire,
Empyrean Sire.
The warm mould stirs
With a secret bliss,
And brambles and burs,
Grasses and flowers,
Teasel and roses,
All equal children of thy wanton hours
With lavish Flora,
Peep from the sod
And turn to their radiant God
With eager faces,
As if to adore a
Danae glory,
And climb and clamber
And jostle and riot
In garden closes
And meadows quiet,
In highways
And byways,
And wild waste places,
Eager to catch the amber
Light of thy smile,
Eager to sip
With redolent lip
The honeyed nectar
Thou spillest the while
From thy lavish beaker,
Far-coursing Beauty-Seeker, Form-Perfecter,
Lover, Reveler, prodigal
God of earth's gay carnival.

The oak swells his girth
And spreads his crown,
The beech feels the stirth
In his bosom brown
And laughs and claps his hands,
The chestnut tugs at the rocks and sands
For tighter anchorage
To wrestle with storms that rage
On his rugged slopes,
The pine broods lone
In his lofty zone
And moans a dirge
Through his beard of snow
To the vales below,
The wild vine gropes
On oak and elm
To sun her clusters on the topmost bough
And bask in the heat
Of thy cloudless realm,
And hoard the sweet
Inspiring wine
Thou only thou,
The Giver Divine,
Givest for meat to bird and bee,
Thy tireless choirsmen in forest and lea.
Down by the stream
In the valley broad
The willows dream,
And to worship awed
The sycamores bend to the mirrored gleam
Of thy image insufferable.
On shelf and knoll
The orchards blow
And toss their roseate snow
In lusty handfuls to the wind,

And the golden bees
In tireless gleanings
From bowl to bowl,
Drone prophecies
But half divined
Of pippin and greening
For Autumn's table.
On rolling plains
The golden grains
Flung wide by Ceres' happy hand
Feel the lure of the summer sky
And climb to watch thee loitering by
At noontide over the quivering land
And stretch their palms
For a precious alms
Of thy lavish gold
To clasp and enfold
And cherish and mould
And dream of and love
'Neath the azure dome
Till they yield it again a hundredfold
In Autumn's harvest-home.

Ah, what are we,
Bright God, to thee
On thy trackless way
Amid the stars,
That these, thy myriad avatars,
With the fresh new day
Are laid at our feet
To pick and choose,
Scorn or abuse,
As seemeth meet
To our proud will?

Or hath pride betrayed us,
And thou hast made us
To perfect these?
As plundering bees
Perfect the orchid's flower,
Perfect the garden's dower,
Setting fair fruit on vine and tree
For the song-birds' summer hostelry?
They too may dream
The good supreme
Is a nectar cup
For them to sup,
Blundering, honey-drunken,
Overswonken
Dreamers sunken
And glorified
In their futile pride.
They too may deem
In their mad dream
This maze of life beneath the moon
A dull old riddle till they have guessed it,
Sucked its meaning and expressed it,
Boomed it and hummed it
In a summer noon,
And divinely summed it
In a drowsy tune.

Ah well!
Let them swell
In their bright brief hour!
The end is still Dust—that may live again
In rose or pippin or golden grain
At thy quickening power.
And if, perchance, we seem to thee
But some less perfect flower,
Or less melodious bee,
Some vagrant unanchored tree,
Or unburnished tuneless bird,— Wait
At thy purple gate,
For soon or late
Some subtle change
May lift us to the nobler range!
Or hast thou a rod to measure all,
Both great and small,
And knowest the soul's tyrannic call,
The proud imperial dream,
The godlike word
Our lips have hurled
Around the world?
These too thy gifts
That break through rifts
Of cloud and clod,
These too the deathless gleam
Of thy ambrosial light,
Disperser of Night?
And we the nearest Latest and dearest
Children of thy nod,
Most glorious God?

The little pools
That lie in schools
On plashy fallows
And drenched meads
When a shower recedes,
And seem as deep
As the vaulted sky
With the cloud-wrack scudding by-- Shall these thy secret keep,
And dream they comprehend
Thy far beginning and thy dreaded end,
Because they hold thy image bright
In their murky shallows?
Or hath thy more ethereal light
To our more perfect inner sight Unveiled a loftier vision,
And wrought a grander dream
Of thy life elysian?
O Light Supreme,
Truth Revealer,
Heart and lip Unsealer,
Touch my presuming lips
With thy inspiring wine
To sing without eclipse
Thy life divine,
In very truth,
From thy far radiant youth!

Behold,
Thou art old,
From everlasting!
Whence thou comest, whither goest,
Thou alone, Immortal, knowest,
But when thou wert young
And lone among Far radiant neighbors,
Thy arduous play
Was catching comets by the mane
And tethering them in the starry plain
Of thy domain,
Thy sterner labors
The shaping and casting
Of virgin spheres
To girdle thee with tendance.
On a golden day,
When thy hand had skill
To work thy will,
And Luck, the oldest of gods, was merry,
A fair new world
Was deftly hurled
And tossed and twirled
With a mighty sweep
In a lucky curve
Round and round thee in the vasty deep,
Never to tarry
And never to swerve
From her glad dependence
On thee, Ambrosial Sire,
And thy sustaining fire—
Earth, thy favorite child,
On whom thou hast smiled
Well pleased to see
Her beauty and her revelry.

But a giant demon,
Enamored of her beauty,
Pursued her as a wanton booty
With bold voluptuous eyes,
Entranced, enraptured,
And swore to make her his leman
And lawful prize,
Lurked in her path unseen
Till she came like an orient queen
Clad in a veil of mist
That glowed like amethyst
About her chaste
New innocence,
Then leaped and captured
Between his outstretched palms
The hapless fugitive.
And so embraced
And bore her hence,
Shuddering, withering, shrinking,
Weeping and ever thinking
Of radiance lost,
But helpless in the mighty clutch
Of the demon Frost.
And she had died
As the demon's bride,
At his icy touch,
Hadst thou not pitied the qualms
Of her mortal grief
And brought relief
And bade her live,
Engirdling her with a magic zone
Of frost-defying light
To shield her in her lone Immortal struggle with the giant's might.

Stormcloud-Render,
God of the lambent skies,
Arbiter and moulder
Of destinies,
Lord of stout hearts
And winged feet
That fly to meet
The imbattled host,
Upon thy shoulder
Girt with light
Hangs the quiver
Filled with darts
To conquer and deliver,
Great Agonist,
In the unequal list
Against the mailed pretender
To the vacant throne
Of ancient Cold,
The eldest born of Primal Night
That reigned on Chaos' frozen coast.
Gird on thy armor,
Stand forth to save
The beautiful slave,
And none shall harm her!
Her heart still beats,
And sometimes a shudder
Startles the children on her breast,
And topples their tiny magnificence,—
Their royal seats
And domes of pleasure,
'Temple and palace,
Mart and spence,
In ruin utter.
Sometimes a mutter
Alarms their leisure

And dooms their jest
When the ruddy chalice
Is at their lips
And their soul nepenthe sips.
But for the rest,
In the giant's icy arms she lies
And slowly dies,
A pallid queen
With anguish mien,
While the slow cold creeps
Through her fair frail form
And seeks the life-blood her Heart keeps warm
In its deeps.

Fierce Lord of Light,
Be swift to smite,
For the crafty demon dies not
And 'fore thy onset flies not,
But loth to yield
The foughten field,
A cunning Parthian, departs
The widening zone
Of flashing gold
Till, having lured thee in his hold
Of boreal cold,
With sudden charge
He hurls thick blinding mists
Before thy face
And hews thy lessening targe
And splinters thy crashing darts
And drives thee pace by pace
Across the gleaming lists
Back to the round
Of thy uttermost bound.

Losing, winning,
Winning, losing,
In the never ending strife--
We who know not thy beginning,
Watching, wondering,
Idly musing,
Deeply pondering
On thy bright ambrosial life,
Question what shall be the end?
Whither doth the conflict tend?
Shalt thou wither, shalt thou flourish,
Conquer in the fight, or perish,
Victor or the victim be?
We know not, is it toil or play
To hold dull Death and Doom at bay,
We know not, is it choice or need
That lends thy flying foot its speed,
Or hast thou reasons
For thy caprice,
Good Shepherd of Seasons?
No answer cometh out of thy East,
No oracle from bird or beast,
To set at peace
Our loftiest doubts and questionings.
We feel and see,
All cometh from thee
In a haunting mystery,
And a low voice sings
From the heart of things:
"Be of good cheer,
Ye are dear
Children of the Living Light,
Well-pleasing in his sight.
The glad All-Giver
Shall deliver
You from death

Though all else perisheth!"
And we plant our foot
On the lush green sod,
And without shame
In thy great name,
Ambrosial God,
Possess the earth
And her garnered fruit
By right of birth
From thee, divine
Founder of our royal line,—
And all the while
In thy lofty way,
Our strength and stay,
Thou smilest thy inscrutable smile.

Or dost thou hear
From some far sphere
A nobler hymn
And sweeter praise
Than seraphim
Ecstatic raise,
And our glad songs
In vibrant throngs
Are wholly drowned
In that sweet sound?
Or seest thou the adoring face
Of prophets of ethereal race
On belted Mars?
Or tired of futile wars,
Disheartened by the losing battle,
Counting when the conflict's done—
The little spoil thy hand has won—
Three handbreadths deep beneath the sod,
A few brief fathoms in the sea,
As much of thy ethereal air
As an eagle's pinions will upbear—
A little crust and scurf of life
Kept only by unending strife,
Too paltry kingdom for a god
Like thee—
Thou yearnest for some newborn world
Unformed and void,
To start some new æonic year
And perfect in its long career
Life unalloyed,
Pleasure uncloyed,
Beauty fresh as the pearled
Shy-hearted rose?
And when thy yearning eyes
Behold that paradise
Elect of thy desire

Swinging through starry skies,
Waiting the seed of thy fire
And the godlike race,
Wilt thou turn away thy face
And thy benign
Bright effluence?
Thy smile divine?
And with stern look
And pitiless nod,
Slowly close
The golden book
Of our finished years?
And despite our tears
And blank despair,
Despite wild prayer
And witless prattle,
Go calmly hence
And leave us to our barren doom,
The cold and gloom
Of a splendid tomb
Of dead magnificence, Inscrutable God?

Ineffable Glory
Flooding the portal
Of the voiceless East,
Hadst thou some far
And bright beginning,
Ambrosial star,
With never a throe
And never a wail,
But perfect among Coequals young,
Full summed in power
From that glad hour,
Flashing a sudden dawn
The darkling worlds upon,
And luring and winning Life from the clod,
Far-darting God?
Or art thou mortal?
Dost thou mutation know?
Wilt thou grow pale?
Wilt thou, too, shorn of light
And reft of manhood's might,
Like us, grow hoary,
And with palsy shaking
And thy great heart breaking
To be released,
Go tottering on thy way
In deepening gloom
Among the wailing stars,
Thy radiant mates
Whose hand unbars
The unreluctant gates
Of ancient Doom
For thee, Bright God of Day,
Thy course half run,
Thy task half done,
And orphaned worlds forsaken
By pitying death o'ertaken?

Whence comes the golden shower
Of mystic power
That swells the bud
And stirs the blood
And sets the June day simmering,
And night's sown fireflies glimmering,
And gay birds winging
And madly singing
Their happy loves
In the checkered groves?
O is it some golden legacy
Of far Chronidean dynasty
Upwarded 'neath some dreadful spell
When the old gods fell
And yielded their throne
To thee alone,
Lord of treasures unending
'That wax with spending?
Forgive if our unfaith
Forefeel some sudden scathe,
And measure thy career
With the rod of mortal fear,
And hearken our despair
And anguished prayer!

O Spendthrift God,
With feet unshod
We come before thee
And implore thee,
Heed our warning!
Restrain thy lavish giving,
Thy reckless, riotous living,
Improvident Lord!
Surely thy hoard
Is well-night spent!
Or art thou coining thy heart of gold
To fling it broadcast into the cold,
Our wisdom scorning?
Canst thou not see
The end of all thy revelry—
Bankrupt, disgraced
Pariah chased
From gate to gate
By every starry mate
Unmindful of thy fallen state?
And we thy helpless progeny
Must share thy wandering beggary,
And hungering die
Beneath a sunless sky!

Or art thou sent
On ways untrod
By some high god
Whose will is Doom?
And though thou care
To heed our prayer,
Thou art not free,
No more a god than we?
Thy path lies through the gloom,
And why thou goest
Thou scarcely knowest?
Nor yet for whom?
And whither thy journey tends Athwart black spaces
Of ancient night,
Thou knowest less?
Or to what races
Thy welcome light
The Doom-God sends?
And all thy fabled wisdom ends
Like ours in a troubled guess?

Thou kissest the tears
From the eyes of flowers
That open their hearts
To thy golden darts
In the matin hours,
O God of light
And of happy wings.
Lord of all bright
Instinctive things
That pluck the day
When it's ripe for play,
Blot out our fears,
That we may see
Naught else but thee.
With thy dispersing rod,
Resplendent God,
Dispel the mists that creep
Over the soul's calm deep.
With thy ambrosial light
Shame thou our mortal night.
Transpierce our wayward dreams
With thy far-darting beams.
Smite our close-lidded eyes to see
Thy golden gift's sole sovranity.
Illume our hearts
With thy fierce darts
And chase the shadow of death
And doubt's cold wraith,
Confirm our faith
To know and see
In very truth that we,
Adoring thee,
Or ere the day is done,
Before our course is run,
Shall have fulfilled
The end the Doom-Gods willed.

O great Lord Sun,
That bringest in this hour
From out thy dun
Nocturnal bower
This fresh new day
With winged chance freighted,
Though sternly fated
To pass away
Irrevocably swift,
We take thy spacious gift
As it is given.
Lord of the riven
Eastern sky,
Unseemly pride
Chastened and purified
By thy baptism of fire,
And all forbidden questionings,
Like homing birds with weary wings,
Sinking to rest,
In tune
With June
And transient things
In life's high quest,
Great God of our Desire,
With unaverted eye
Let us adore
Thee evermore!

NAPOLEON AT AIX

Wait here, my Marshalls,—follow not within The august precincts of his Chapel Tomb.
 This hour is mine.

* * * * *

They are my tools, no more,
 Wherewith I build my empire or contrive
 A scandal at the Court. What need they know
 In this vast business of our Phoenix France
 More than the pawn when he is deftly moved
 To take a queen or mate a king? They do
 My errands, and their destinies grow big
 With honors. Save for me their heads had ne'er Emerged above the seething bloody scum
 Of sightless anarchy.

This Charles the Great
 Communes but with his peers. No fitting Third
 Can share this hour, unless that mighty Spirit
 Whose star yet blazes in mid heaven descend
 And flash the glory of Imperial Rome
 About us. What a consulship this world
 Had bent to, had Fate dared in one sole age
 Engender such Triumvirate. Old Earth
 Is cramped, and fragile is the race of men:
 Fate cast a thousand years between our cradles
 To keep her course unhindered.

I am France,
 And here lies France entombed. O Brother Prince,
 Be not the awful dust thou art to such
 As deem thee dead, but come in panoply
 Of burnished steel that clanks about thy shoulders
 That bear untamed the whole embattled world,

And make the pavement ring with lusty tread
 And dangling blade, and look with those dread eyes
 From under brows that rise sheer like a castle
 Upon a cliff's edge, Genius of Olden France,
 And bring the glory back that filled the world
 And rang through ten far centuries, and I
 Will greet thee, bringing our regenerate France,
 And beg a royal boon.

Thou hast a crown,
 And I am crownless!

Lo, I go a journey,
 A long one, full of dread, for he who goes
 From doubt to resolution travels far,
 From nadir to full zenith.

* * * * *

How it gleams
 And flashes radiance, blinding, luring, mocking!
 Caesar refused it—thrice!—when proffered him
 Upon the feast of Lupercal!—He feared
 The people!—Craven moment dearly paid
 At foot of Pompey's statue!—

Well I know
 That fear's temptation. Should I ride the streets
 Of Paris on the morrow, down the lanes
 Of loyal citizens whose joyous shouts
 Stun the far welkin, and should part my vestment
 And show one purple line, the sullen mob
 Could count the horses' footfalls on the pavement
 In the dead silence; not a cap would fly
 Into the stagnant air. I know these Frenchmen.

First Consul—by decree!—They deem me naught
 But their own Hand, their Eye, their Heart and Will,
 And by that fiction hangs their fealty.
 A name can break it.

How it gleams and glows,
 The Beautiful, the Fatal! How it sits
 Upon his brow! Its rays play round his head, Illuming ruddy cheek and snow-white beard.
 He speaks not—Yet his eyes play with dread Doom.
 Do they foresee, foreread in Time's Arcana Impending incarnations? What if he Should speak—and say: Adopted Son, kneel down, Receive my crown and wear it worthily!
 Should I refuse, as Caesar?

There it gleams,
 Weaving divinity about his brows,
 Compelling mute submission. 'Twere a meed
 To dare damnation for!—Yet not dishonor!—
 A great King takes his crown—no gift, but rapine—
 Erect, not kneeling, worlds in awe consenting
 To conscious empery. O I am weary
 Of truckling to a mob of pigmies!—Faugh!

How tall! Full head and shoulders overtopping
 The commons. I was once the Little Corporal.
 A scurvy trick of Fate—my soul as lofty
 Looks him full level in the eye—to clip
 My stature so. Were he to toss his robe
 About my shoulders, it would sweep the pavement
 Like a queen's train, and round the Courts of Europe
 An universal gibe would run, and then
 Buffoons might win the Garter for a jest,
 Ladies would titter from behind their fans,
 And waiting-maids forget love-rendezvous,
 Or break Court etiquette, unchid, for very laughter,—
 As if some half a cubit more of worms'-meat
 Beneath the ermine made him more a king!
 The Will, the Might and Skill to make a realm
 And reign—these make a King. And I have made
 My realm and reigned, as well as mighty Charles.

First Consul!—gift or sufferance—a stigma,
 Save that with infinite finesse and craft
 I drew all rights and powers to myself
 And set my heel upon the Senate. Fools!
 To bear a yoke, yet tremble at its name:
 For I am France.

Most sad, inscrutable,
 Yet godlike! Such a countenance of pain
 And glory, lit by thousand tongues of light
 That leap and play about his moveless brow
 As if to start him into life and tell
 By moved lip and flushing cheek and lit
 Deep liquid eye some secret of the world
 That lies beneath. I too at need can be Inscrutable as Death and Doom. No faction
 Can read my will and so misuse it. Prince Most enviable, thou hadst no need to make Thy face a mask to cover secret dreams,
 As I in this new age of licence named
 The Dawn of Freedom.

Subtle must he be
 Who rules these French. Some old Republican
 Must fall to win the Bourbon, and the last Fair scion of the old régime must sigh
 His soul out in a prison yard at dawn
 Mid sullen crash of musketry to appease
 The incensed Republican, and I across them
 Move two steps nearer an Imperial Throne.
 The art of governing is simple else:
 Corrupt this one with office, that with gold,
 Buy this one with an Order, flatter that
 With public praise, imprison this bold wretch
 And pardon that, inspire the poet's song
 With gold and laurels, loose the orators'
 Sweet adulation, censor stage and press,

And fool the mad fanatic with pretense,
 And if the madder factions still must rage,
 Hatch out some heinous plot in London town
 To breed assassins 'gainst the Glory of France,
 Or scent some mighty league of crowns and mitres
 To turn her dial back—send out the news
 Concoct of truth and lies—the Moniteur
 Will print it—Scold a British Lord at Court—
 'Twill please the chauvinist! O I am weary
 Of all this despicable meanness!

Where

Is that divinity doth hedge a King?
 I have no crown. There lies the subtle charm,
 The Talisman that sets him far aloof
 In that fine air where factions hush their clamor
 And baseness stands abashed, all hearts are tuned
 To perfect loyalty and unbought service.
 All arts and crafts there band together like
 A mighty orchestra, each plays his part
 In grand symphonic order, loving more
 The perfect music than his own small part.

I too would lead my people, and so smite
 The startled ears of Europe with the wild
 Sweet symphony of France—a perfect piece—
 All discords melting into harmony
 And closing with a flourish of sweet sound
 Deathlessly memorable.

But the Courts
 Of Europe fear it, lest the noble strain
 Stir echoes far beyond the Rhine and Channel.
 Consul! A decade—ay, perchance for life!—
 Dictator, if the Senate choose—What boots?
 They bide their time, and wait for fickle Fate
 To plunge me from this pinnacle, or Death,
 The unconquered Agonist. There shines my Star
 Ascendant. Let them wait!

Seductive Marvel
 That so transfigurest Imperial Charles
 And so begodst him in the eyes of mortals,
 Art thou that mystic power, or but a symbol
 Of that which subtler is and mightier—Legitimacy?

That must make me pause.
 My father was a Tuscan gentleman,
 My mother a mean Corsican, and all
 My vasty will, my vision, my ambition,
 The kingliest in me come alone from her,
 Her unspoiled blood, her undegenerate soul.
 I come from the Primeval, the Primordial—
 A shaft sent random, or a bolt of Doom
 Shot to its mark?—and better far the first Of virile dynasty than sapless last
 Of senile race decadent, dead, a corpse
 Embalmed in odorous Legitimacy.

Then let them gibe and sneer, write epigrams,
 And play at shuttle-cock with 'parvenu',
 'Usurper', till they split. There shines my Star Ascendant. Let them sneer.

Great Charles could count
 His noble forebears—royal, ducal—on The fingers of his sword-hand.

I will found
 My dynasty, though Europe hurl her legions
 Upon my sword. I will repel her hordes
 As Charles hurled back the Saracen, and make My dreaded name a rampart round my realm,
 And dictate peace, and reign, acclaimed of all Keeper of Europe's peace.

* * * * *

How mad a dream
 To haunt the pillow of a sterile bed!—
 * * * Josephine!

I do remember well
 The day she came to thank me for the sword
 Of Beauharnais I gave her son. Such grace,
 Such wondrous charm of manner, such fair speech,
 Such beauty—all that Nature and high Art
 Could make her—perfect woman. I knew not Love's passion till that hour. I wooed—and won her
 Like a great victory—And when she came From Paris to Marengo, such a light
 Filled all the camp that war grew instant glory,
 Like olden tournaments, and France's marshalls
 Grew knightly—marvels wrought they emulous
 To win her smile, as from an empress' lips.
 I find no spot in her—save one—she's barren.
 Why must she bear a brace of Beauharnais
 And not one Buonaparte?

Should I sue
 To break the bonds—the Senate complaisant,
 The Pope grown pliable—'twould raise a storm
 Of such wide fury in Camp and Court, must sweep
 My dream of empery to vasty ruin.

Speak, August Shade, if counsel may yet pass
 Those calm sealed lips. The chrism of Death was poured Upon thy brow, the sword fell from thy hand,
 The scepter passed. Couldst thou unmoved behold
 The mighty handiwork of glorious years—
 Thine—parted, ravined, spent, smirched, and despoiled, Quite blotted out, as if it ne'er had been?

Old Europe dreams—and waits.

I am still young.
 My Star rides in a happy House. I go
 To Notre Dame. My Josephine shall wear
 An Empress' crown. What more can woman ask?
 And when my throne is firm—she shall retire—
 France clamors for an heir.

The proudest Court,
 Our old inveterate enemy, shall lend
 His royalest to scent our nascent line
 With that old feudal musk, Legitimacy.
 Then let them gibe and sneer.

Lo, how it gleams,
 The Caesars' emblem, radiant, luring, speaking,
 With mystic message pleading—Here I kneel,
 O mighty Charles. Make me thy son and heir.
 I take the crown of France from thy dead hands
 And wear it—royally. No other power
 Henceforth shall bend my knee.

I go a journey—
 A dread one—rude and lone—For he who goes
 From doubt to resolution treads the path Of Doom and Glory.

Farewell, mighty Prince!
 A new Age dawns. My will is Arbitrer.
 Tomorrow I am Emperor of the French.
 My sword shall carve a name deathless forever.

LOVE'S TRIUMPH.

δεῖ πᾶσαν γυναῖκα, κ.τ.λ.

Herod. Bk. I, 199

i

Vashti-Hauna, dawn-cheeked princess,
 Daughter of Asshur, King of Kings,
 Feels Astarte's tropic sunshine
 Burning at the heart of things,
 Feels it in the passionate riot
 Of her breast's imaginings.

Vashti-Hauna, dawned-cheeked princess,
 Knows her woman's hour is come,
 As a lotus bud at bursting
 Half forefeels the perfect sum
 Of her sun-dreams and moon-yearnings,
 Half foreknows it—and is dumb.

Vashti-Hauna looks to eastward
 From her tower in Nineveh,
 Looks and sighs—she knows the custom
 And the gifts that maidens lay
 On the altars of Mylitta—
 Knows the price her votaries pay—

Gazes eastward on the temple
 Where the passionate throngs resort,
 Then upon her swelling bosom
 And her young limbs' queenly port,
 Praying for Astarte's favor,
 Triumph in her Temple Court.

ii

Vashti-Hauna, dawn-cheeked princess,
 Daughter of Asshur, King of Kings,
 Doffs her scented silken bravery,
 Veils and gems and golden rings,
 Dons the meanest menial raiment
 That her poorest bond-slave brings ;

Stains her limbs and neck and bosom
 Like a sun-kissed shepherdess's,
 With her deft hand draws the carven
 Ivory that holds her tresses,
 Slips unmarked amid the motley
 Throng that down the highway presses.

iii

Haughty Shemir, Aram's daughter,
 Princess of the House of Shu,
 Rolls in pompous covered carriage
 Aisles of frightened pilgrims through,
 Scorning even to share the sunshine
 With that motley Syrian crew.

Khazakhan, the Prince of Shelar,
 Rides beside her carriage door :
 "Room! Make room for mighty Shemir
 Whom the sun and stars adore!
 Never hath such queenly beauty
 Trod yon Temple Court before!"

Crack the eunuch drivers' lashes,
 Rear the horses mad with pain,
 Rear and plunge—The dusty pilgrims
 Terror-stricken seek the plain—;
 Vashti-Hauna sole undaunted
 Turns with look of deep disdain,

Rises to her queenliest stature,
Lifts to heaven her empty hands,
Flinging Khazakhan defiance
With her spirit's mute commands,
Horse and rider quail before her—
Mighty Shemir's carriage stands.

iv

Vashti-Hauna, dawn-checked princess,
Daughter of Asshur, King of Kings,
Bows her royal head in silence,
But her heart within her sings
As she treads the Temple highway
Light as if her feet had wings.

Khazakhan, the Prince of Shelar,
Dumb with admiration stares
At the mute Astarte vision
As she toward the Temple fares:
"Is it Beltis come to warn me Of the haughty Shemir's snares?"

v

In the Temple Court the pilgrims
Sit in long and braveried rows:
Khazakhan, the Prince of Shelar,
Down their aisles of beauty goes,
Peering under veil and head-dress
For the wondrous eye he knows.

Haughty Shemir leaves he sitting,
Rank and wealth he passes by;
Love that scorns all outward splendor,
Worshiping it knows not why,
Guides him to her place of bidding.
He with sudden joyous cry

Tosses in her lap the obol:
"Follow in Mylitta's name!"
Vashti-Hauna, dawn-cheeked princess,
Rises, neck and cheek aflame,
Stands triumphant: "Gracious Beltis, Take the gift thy altars claim!"

THE RINGEL DANCE.

Valley steaming,
Hillside teeming,
Summer skips and smiles askance at Hand-clasped Hours that ringel-dance it
Through the fields in mazy transit, Wheeling and fleeting,
Merrily greeting
Brawling fall and reedy shallow,
Tangled copse and weedy fallow.

And ever behind them a stridulous tune
Sends a chill through the heart of June:—
    I need not look for the grim gaunt Fiddler,
    I know he is coming, the weird old Riddler,
By his rune!

Roses blooming,
Bumbles booming,
Dipping, sipping in the swinging
Sunlit cups, a moment clinging,
Touch and away with reckless winging,
Humming snatches
Of drunken catches
Overheard on the daisied hill,
To the lily's nunnery white and still.

And ever behind them the self-same tune
Startles the drowsy ear of noon:—
    I know whose head o'er the viol is stooping,
    For rose-leaves fall and the lily is drooping
All too soon!

Sunny maiden
 Flower laden
 Trips the meads in summer fettle,
 Plucking the daisy's wizard petal
 Life's uncertain doom to settle:
 "Loves me, not, loves me!
 O what behooves me
 Say to him, do for him, day-time or night,
 My hero, my king, my joy, and my light!"

And ever behind her a maddening tune
 Floats o'er the daisied meads of June:—
     I need not look who swings the bow so,
     For I know the grinning old Virtuoso
 By his rune!

Coy lips cleaving,
 Bosoms heaving,
 Fancy plotting Love's devices
 Fit for orient paradises
 Hidden deep in an isle of spices,
 Soft eyes yearning,
 Passions burning,
 Soul concentered in a kiss
 Demons envy and angels miss.

And ever behind them a grisly rune—
 A terror stalking in Love's full noon:—
     For 'Carpe diem' is the Fiddler's motto
     And a scythe-clang sounds in each sharp staccato
 Of his tune!

Sweet-tongued singer,
Beauty bringer,
Poet of the woodland's chatter,
Ear attuned to the distant patter
Of dancing feet of nymph and satyr,
Eye enraptured,
Senses captured
By the pomp of Earth, the splendor
Of the spirits that attend her.

And ever behind him the same weird tune
So near—O the glory and gladness of June!—
    His skull is crowned with the victor's laurel—
    But not for the poet—I know the moral
Of his rune!

THE LONG ROAD.

There's a long long road lying white in memory's light
And it's traveled but by phantoms of a wistful long ago.

I can see them trooping trooping, and I love the eerie sight,
And I march keeping step with the kindly ghosts I know.

It comes from out the woodlands and it runs into the hills

Straight and white o'er hill and hollow with the green on either hand,
And I follow follow follow, till my heart with sunshine fills
At the crunch of happy footsteps in that fair lost land.

And I haste to overtake her in her jaunty cap and plaid Till she turns to meet my greeting with a frank and hearty smile

And a flush of rosy welcome that makes the morning glad
As we trudge the miles together to the school-house stile.

Now we reach the stately elm-tree with its lofty grapevine swing

Where we braved the teacher's ferule and the far-off warning bell
Just to try the strange sensation of two birds upon the wing
As they fly in mated cycles under love's strong spell.

There too lies the grassy clearing in the woodland where we played
Drop the kerchief, and her red lips with a dawning passion swelled
As another caught and kissed her, and my heart a tumult made
That my own hard-won success and blushing guer-don hardly quelled.

Here the broad marsh fringed with blue-flags, cat-tails and sweet calamus
Where we teased the nesting black-birds and the lily-striding frogs,
And with pebbles shied among them with a cunning perilous
Made the stolid Parsee turtles slide from off their sunny logs.

Now we pause beneath the bur-oak with its gnarled and spreading form
That so kindly tented o'er us on one far ambrosial night
When the singing-school was over and she clung so close and warm
That we loved to linger sheltered from the full moon's light.

Hard before us lies the hollow where the rail-fence piled snow billows
White and fluffy, and we dared the Storm-king's elemental powers—
Like a pair of sleepy children flung ourselves on Winter's pillows,
And with intertwined initials marked the virgin bed as ours.

Not a foot of that white road-way but is radiant with her presence,

Yet if I should clasp the phantom as Ixion's cloud-bride thin,

All the madness would o'erwhelm me of the end of earthly pleasance—

I whose acres lay in Cloud-land lacked the heart to woo and win.

O the long long road lying clear in memory's light

That is traveled but by phantoms of the long long ago!

I can see them trooping trooping, and I love the friendly sight,

So I march keeping step with the kindly ghosts I know.

THE IDEAL.

I had a dream.

The empty darkness burst to bloom
Like a vast hushed lily-bud, all white and glorious,
And smote my soul with ever-widening spheres of perfume,
And flooded her surprised sense with wave on wave of serene light.

The lily's heart disclosed a virgin form,
All pure as snow, of loveliest mien,
Such as the artist-lover's soul
Dreams in supreme moments of creative power,
As if the chisel had for once attained
The master miracle, a perfect piece.

Her eyes beamed on me,
With sweetest invitation, half concealed.
Her lips grew red and full
As if her spirit waited there
To rush in rapturous kisses on the brow
Of her elected lord.

The hot hunger of my soul o'erpowered me.
With passionate arms, and heart loud-beating in excessive joy,
As once Pygmalion when he gazed entranced
On his own marble dream made flesh through love,
I clasped her, held her, one ecstatic moment,
And covered her white breasts with kisses.
The glad tears burst from their unwonted springs
All uncontrolled and fell upon her.
A subtle tremor went through all her frame.
And then with her white hand she caught the pearly drops
And drank them, sighing.

She touched my brow and spake:
"Lo! I have sealed thee mine, beloved!"

And when I looked into her eyes,
They vanished like fair sister stars
Withdrawn to inaccessible deeps of night,
And stood fixed in imperishable beauty.
Her white form slipped from my embrace
And I awoke with choking sobs.

Since when all the world is grown less fair.
I see her glide athwart all earthly forms,
That straightway pale and wither,
Their radiance by her splendor dimmed.
And thus I wander through the vacant years
A joyless soul, (and yet not asking joy,)
Nor smile, nor weep,
Until I find her, clasp her,
Though I must pass the ninefold barred and mystic gates
To win her.

THE SMITH'S SONG.

I hammer my Will into stubborn steel.

A god in me chooses the form.

When the white-hot metal's rebellion I feel

Hot passions into my right arm steal

And make the reverberant anvil peal

While sparks like crinkled lightnings reel

In a storm:

For whatever I fashion with might and skill,

Cling, clang,

Cling, clang,

Is ever my will, my will, my will!

I hammer my Will till the steel is cold.

Sometimes I call it a share.

The world that lay naked for eons untold,

My will shall deck it with wind-blown gold

Of harvests sixty and hundred fold.

Go! Furrows of brown through the virgin mould

Uptear!

Whatever I fashion with might and skill,

Cling, clang,

Cling, clang,

Is ever my will, my will, my will!

I hammer my Will from sun till sun.

Sometimes I call it a hook.

I send it abroad when the forging is done

To trim wild Edens whose vineyards run

Too rank for a world where perfection is spun,

For my will no Chaos from Order won

Can brook.

Whatever I fashion with might and skill,

Cling, clang,

Cling, clang,

Is ever my will, my will, my will!

I hammer my Will week in, week out.

Sometimes I call it a shoe.

My steed fares forth with his rider stout
To carry God's message the world about :

"One Love, one Law, one Dream, one Doubt,
And one Salvation for gentle and lout :

Be true!"

Whatever I fashion with might and skill,

Cling, clang,

Cling, clang,

Is ever my will, my will, my will!

I hammer my Will from birth till death.

Sometimes I call it a sword.

Rest bright and keen in a ready sheath

Till the maddened foeman's insolent breath
Shall sully our world with a threat of scath,
Then leap and flash like the awful wraith

Of the Lord!

Whatever I fashion with might and skill,

Cling, clang,

Cling, clang,

Is ever my will, my will, my will!

I hammer my Will into stubborn steel.

A god in me chooses the form.

I forge on my stithy the commonweal.

My arm and my word are its sign and seal.

And whenever the metal's rebellion I feel

My sledge makes the verberant anvil peal

Like a storm!

For whatever I fashion with might and skill,

Cling, clang,

Cling, clang,

Is ever my will, my will, my will!

LOST LOVE'S RETURN.

My hearth-fire burneth dim and low,
    The fine air groweth chill,
A darkness climbeth along the walls
And thin shapes flit through the twilight halls
    Incessant to and fro.
I feel them sweep like an icy breath,
They whisk my cheeks with a touch of death,
    And my heart, it standeth still.

My heart, it standeth a moment still,
    Then leapeth sudden and wild:
"O is it my fair lost Love ye bear?
O stay your flitting, ye shapes of air,
    And yield her to my will,
For I fain would win her to my desire,
Though her lips were ice to my lips of fire,
    And her star eyes coldly smiled!"

My heart, it leapeth and will not cease.
    The shapes, they crowd around:
"O we are the dreams that came to thee
When June was abloom and the heart was free,
    And the soul was well-at-ease,
What time we were all too chaste and cold
For a purple-blooded youth to hold
    In love's embraces bound!"

My heart, it quaketh and will not rest,
My head, it bendeth low:
"O we flit and flit till dawn is alit,
And on cheeks where death's chaste lily-buds sit
We breathe our wooing hest.
For the hand she clasped was the hand of a boy
That crushed the blown lily in eager joy
To possess her fragrant snow."

My heart, it trembleth and can not hold,
My head, it sinketh still:
"O stay your flitting, ye shapes of air,
I know ye are fair, too white and fair,
For arms of mortal mould!—
But I fain would clasp you and hold you now,
Though your kisses were cold on my fevered brow
And your wan breasts icy chill!"

O stand, my heart, be forever still,
And leap no longer wild:
"O we are the spirits that tended of yore
Thy fair lost Love whom we now restore
And yield to thy chastened will.
No more we flit till dawn is alit,
But with folded wings a garland we'll knit
At the feet of the reconciled!"

IN THE DESERT.

Three vultures wheel in slant-winged flight
Above the desert's tawny stretches
And wind down narrowing stairs of light.

Beneath them like three guilty wretches
Three shadows whisk across the sand,
And each its lessening cycle etches.

The goal the ominous obscene band
Still shuns, or seems to shun, while seeking,
Lies helpless in that pitiless land.

Sand-choked beyond articulate speaking
He follows mute with questioning eyes
Those fearful gyres, those pinions reeking.

Panting in horror vain convulsive cries
He raves a maniac prayer for succor—
Wards off the loathesome bulk and dies—
Such sepulture hath Sheik Ibn Becar!

THE DRAGON-FLY.

Fanning with iridescent wing
 The dank airs of the reedy marsh,
 Darting in disport, elfin thing,
 Among the water-grasses harsh,
 Now clinging to some sedge's stem,
 Now floating double in the breeze,
 Thou art at times a living gem,
 At times a queen of sylphides.
 Innocent, beauteous, luckless sprite,
 Gorgeous daemon as brief as bright!

Had luckier fates thy birth-place set
 With snow-drop or with violet,
 With wild-rose or with fleur-de-lis,
 How happy were such lot for thee!
 Painters would try thy gauzy wing,
 Poets essay thy grace to sing
 And wonder with half despairing sigh
 How lily and rose and world and sky
 Are mirrored in thy wide-orbed eye,
 And seers would dream of harmonies
 Fixed at the birth of eternities
 And babble of mighty wisdom still
 That planned thy sphere with prescient skill.

What wondrous change a birth-place makes!
 Each soul some fatal color takes
 From what it touches at its source.
 Thou sylphid beauty of the fen
 Art shunned and spurned by bearded men,
 And tender children deem thee worse—
 Confederate of an old world-curse,
 A feeder of loathesome slimy snakes.
 With clubs and stones, imbruted crew,
 Thy fragile grace they swift pursue,
 Striving to quench in reedy slime
 Too transient Beauty before its time.

INVITATION.

I have no gold but the sunset's gold,
No silver but storm-cloud's lining;
I have no lands that are bought and sold,
Nor castles of man's designing.

But I have estates sky-rimmed and broad
Where the breath of song is blowing,
Whose wealth by love's own guileless fraud
Is doubled at each bestowing.

My wool is the fleece of vernal cloud,
My silk the gossamer sailing,
My purple the autumn twilight shroud
When the happy day-light's failing.

What lieth in reach of ear and eye
Or Argonaut fancy's tasking,
From the heart of the earth to the dome of the sky,
Is mine for the simple asking.

So come, my Friend, for an hour, for a day,
For a life-time's happy straying,
And arm in arm we'll wander away
In love's perennial Maying.

WHITE WASTE OF SNOW.

White waste of snow, gray waste of years,
I said and sighed, thus sadly linking
The winter's glory with foolish tears.

So much of beauty, to my thinking,
And warmth lay buried under both,
In death's white stupor mutely sinking.

Earth spring and life's spring, virgin growth,
Snow-drop and innocence, love and the roses,
To see them perish my soul is loth.

I know that under the snow reposes
A death that is not wholly dead,
But, couched and curtained, merely dozes

And dreams of waking all purple and red
To play with sunbeam and warm rains plashing
And laugh at the sky where the winds are fed:

But under the waste of years so ashen
What dream is a-dreaming of dawns to be?
Will the world-old rhythm in some new fashion
Bring back the spring and the bud to me?

THE PERFECT ROSE.

Ah me! Who knows where the perfect rose
From mortals hidden in beauty blows?
    In far off gardens of Gulistan?
    In Sharon's valley? Or neath the ban
Of mage Laurin's Tyrolean close?

Or fresh as when the world began
And modest creatures fled from Pan,
    Just under my window it shyly glows?
    Ah me! Who knows?

Or an airy nothing, a shadowy plan—
A dream-flower burst from the heart of man
    To seal with beauty life's thorny prose?
    Then wherefore yearn for impalpable shows
And scorn Reality's blushing clan?
    Ah me! Who knows?

MY CAT-BIRD.

My cat-bird sings—for June is here—
From sweet syringa and spice-bush clear
    Her notes are shaken out again
    In showers of most melodious rain.
I pause to bend a thirsty ear.

Sweet witchery born of joy, not pain,
Whole orchestra packed in a single strain—
    The oriole's gay, but without a peer
    My cat-bird sings.

I peer through the spice-bush leaves in vain
For a glimpse of her stage dress gray and plain,
    And her throat a-quiver, but I can hear
    Her soul expanding in a sphere
Of ecstasy, when thus amain
    My cat-bird sings.

ON MOUNTAIN HEIGHTS.

On mountain heights the air is keen,
The sun shines cold, there is no screen
    Of warm gray clouds that valleys know.
The eye, forsaking fields below,
Expatiates in a lordlier scene.

The heart beats bolder mid the snow,
The breath comes fuller as we go,
    The soul expands and grows serene
        On mountain heights.

When wearied with the sordid woe
Of bootless errands to and fro
    Mid murk and men in valleys green,
    Look up where eagles sit and preen
Their wings for flashing in the glow
    On mountain heights.

ONE SOLE STAR FIXED.

One sole star fixed while thousands turn
Like cherubim that gaze and burn
    In heaven's mighty chariot wheel
    Whose vasty spokes harmonic reel
Down slopes that seers can scarce discern.

I too the cosmic cyclone feel—
Pomp of mad dreams, storms that conceal,
    Where'er I turn, howe'er I yearn,
        One sole star fixed.

The days whirl by, and scorn appeal,
As if to hint, or half reveal,
    Some vast return of more concern
    Than a World's ashes in Time's huge urn,
But never a vision clear to heal—
        One sole star fixed.

WHEN LUCIA CAME.

Was it a dream when Lucia's spirit came Breaking that blind transparency—whose name
    Nor bard nor seer has skill to sing or say—
    That walled me in from her who went her way
And left me wondering at Love's futile claim?

Upon my couch in some deep trance I lay
When burst upon me that candescent ray:
    Could mortal tongue the idle question frame:
    Was it a dream?

Too clear for sleep's remembering, clear as day
The lips' touch, hands' clasp, eyes that love betray
    In love's reproof: "Is oft-sworn faith so lame?
    So unexpected? Farewell!" In my shame
Love flowered to madness, yet she would not stay.
    Was it a dream?

LEAVES ARE WE.

Leaves are we that sit in the sun
Where the wonder and glory of summer are spun.
    Guests for a time of centennial trees
    We dance with the gay young courtier breeze
While the Merlin days pass one by one.

The days, O the days! What gifts are these!
Purple and scarlet and gold! Who sees
    Their subtle magic till sere and dun
    Leaves are we?

Flown are the birds and numb are the bees,
And we huddle in drifts round the gnarled knees
    Of un pitying hosts. Our course is done;
    But their girth is ampler, their branches run
Nearer the sky, for our golden ease—
    Ah, leaves are we!

FRA ELBERTUS' "ESSAY ON SILENCE:"

O gentle Book whose letter never dims
The spirit's message! Wise old Fra and kindly
To help the weary soul that gropes so blindly
In mazy book-marts! Here his genius skims
Wit's golden cream, his cunning deftly trims
A flawless, fadeless garland, where combined lie
All perfect meanings since the world designedly
Made books—and critics damned them trunk and limbs.

Most perfect Book, rare bible of our age,
Pocket companion, friend, adviser, host,
My Little Journey on Bohemia's coast
Is sweetened daily by thy sphinxlike page.
'Silence is golden!' Yet who dreamed of old
That she could turn white paper into gold?

MY SHRINE.

Some fare to distant Mecca, some to Rome,
Yet others to some nearer lowlier shrine
More oft revisited nor less divine
Than prophet's haunt or vicar's lofty dome.
Each finds' a god there and his heart's true home;
But mine is lowliest of all—a line
Of tumbling rail-fence clambered o'er with vine
Embowered in dog-rose. Thither oft I roam.

And still I find my goddess waiting there
As when long long ago one golden day
I met my first Love there at dawn of May.
I plucked two roses for her raven hair
And crowned her May Queen. Still on cheeks of snow
I see that brace of lovelier roses blow.

ZEPHYR AND MYRTLE.

Young Zephyr tiptoed in the long grave-grass
To whisper Lady Myrtle on the ground:
"Why keep the vigil on this sunken mound?
Come out and play where happy creatures pass!"
But mild-eyed Myrtle answered soft: "Alas!
Of loving footfalls I have heard no sound
For endless summers. Swiftly round and round
Days dance with days like jocund lad and lass.

And still, sweet Zephyr, you're my only guest.
Come, part the grasses, sit a while and rest
Here on this toppled head-stone green and rotten.
Fickle as wind is man, as April brittle!
Spell out the words—'twill sober you a little—
That loving hands carved: 'Gone, but not forgotten'."

A MEMORY.

A white house stands upon a way-side hill,
Tall pine-trees guard it in a double row;
Their branches droop beneath the weight of snow,
And moon-cast shadows lurk there midnight-still.
The envious winter wind blows crisp and chill
And swings the yard-gate sharply to and fro:
"Whose are the dainty foot-prints there?" I know—
The old gate knows—and feels his dull wood thrill.

The winds of many winters blow and blow
To drift those dainty tell-tales deftly over;
The suns of many summers glow and glow
To melt those runes of happy maid and lover;
But mocking still the jealous seasons' spite
They lie there glorified in endless light.

*Across the sea I send my freighted craft.
Hope springs before her like a plumed shaft
From Love's bow hurtled. On the wave-washed beach
I watch the lovely hazard, and beseech
Gray Ocean's daughters spare my winged raft.*

*Ye gods above, below, I vow to each Meet gifts, if through yon billows' threatening breach
My love-spied, hope-led ship ye safely waft
Across the sea.*

*What hecatombs, what temples roofed—O teach Me, Wind and Wave, to be your anger's leech!—
Ye trumpeting west winds follow her abaft.
Poseidon, spare her from your pronged haft!
I hold my breath till she the haven reach
Across the sea!*

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 018 407 785 1